Letter from the Research Director

Any American born between 1990 and 2000 probably doesn't remember a world without smartphones, Facebook and Game of Thrones. They also likely don't recall a time when people kept their shoes on at airport security, could go all the way to the gate to see their friends off, or thought "Patriot Act" was just a good deed. Today's 15 to 25 year olds don't know an America before the horrific events of September 2001. They are "Generation 9/11."

For American Muslims, membership in this generation presents additional challenges. Their religious community, according to polls, is among the least warmly regarded of any in the country and their country's news media portrays their faith and community negatively 80% of the time. They face bullying, racial profiling and job discrimination.

Moreover, they face the same challenges of growing up as any other American, from drug and alcohol abuse to online safety to risky sexual experiences. And like other Americans, their community also struggles with racism and a crisis of religious literacy. At the same time, American mosques leaders, like their counterparts in other faiths, are finding it difficult to meet the unique needs of young people.

ISPU's "Meeting the Needs of Generation 9/11" brief series addresses some of these challenges and offers actionable recommendations for parents, community leaders and national organizations. Each brief can stand on its own or be used as part of the series for a comprehensive approach to tackling the hurdles faced by today's youth and young adults. We brought together practitioners and academics, imams and parents, local leaders and national figures, grandparents and college students to craft practical recommendations that could be applied in a variety of contexts.

Though we set out to address a number of pressing topics, we make no claim that our series is exhaustive. There are important topics that we have not covered but hope to tackle in the future. These include offline bullying and the unique needs of refugee Muslim youth as examples.

We hope these briefs help you meet the needs of this unique generation of American Muslims. We welcome your thoughts and questions.

Sincerely,

Dalia Mogahed

Introduction

On Saturday and Sunday, June 6 and 7, 2015, the Institute for Social Policy and Understanding (ISPU) hosted a two-day solution seeking convening on American Muslim Youth. The convening held at the El-Hibri Foundation in Washington, DC brought together 31 American Muslim experts and stakeholders ranging in age from 18 to 68.

The group came together to discuss some of the significant challenges and opportunities faced by young American Muslims today, namely young people between the ages of 15 and 25. The group included MBAs, entrepreneurs, mental health professionals, social workers, marketers, religious leaders, activists and even a Fulbright scholar. In the words of Meira Neggaz, ISPU's Executive Director, what the diverse group all had in common was, "that we care about young people and we want young American Muslims to thrive in America."

ISPU developed a list of potential invitees through outreach and referrals from practitioners who work with young people including American Muslims. The final list was based on a potential invitee's experience working with American Muslim youth, in general, and their ability to contribute to the themes and topics of the convening in particular. The final list included end user stakeholders: imams, parents, board members, youth directors, chaplains and national youth organization representatives. Consideration was also given to their geographic, religious and ethnic diversity. The 31 participants selected were individuals who met these criteria and were willing to participate in the two-day set of discussions.

While there is a great deal of useful research on American Muslims, very little of it is ever acted on. ISPU brought this group together to operationalize some of the research by posing the questions, "So What? Now What?"

ISPU as host and convener provided funding and staffing for the workshop. ISPU also created a facilitated and supportive environment for open and honest conversation. Discussions and recommendations from the convening were both a research tool and source for this report on American Muslim Youth.

To encourage open and free conversation and discussion, the convening honored Chatham House Rule. Comments have not been attributed to participants. No live tweeting or social media was allowed during the sessions and no individual audio- or video-recording in the room was permitted.

Why this Convening on American Muslim Youth?

ISPU's focus on research making an impact guides the organization to address and answer questions critical and relevant to American Muslim communities. "How can we meet the needs of Muslim youth?" is one of the top questions that ISPU gets asked by its stakeholders and supporters.

The convening focused on young American Muslims between the ages of 15 and 25, or younger Millennials. According to Pew Research Center, the Millennial generation is "forging a distinctive path into adulthood."¹ Coming of age during a time of technological change, globalization and economic disruption, their behaviors and experiences are unique. Millennials are the first digital natives and the most racially diverse generation in history. Behaviorally—in comparison to their parents—they have low levels of social trust, are less linked to organized politics and religion, more linked by social media, more likely to defer marriage, and more optimistic about the future.²

Understanding this generation's broad characteristics is critical when looking at young American Muslims. Young American Muslims are unique in that they are the first true post-9/11 generation. As a generation that was born or came of age around 9/11, they have grown up at a time when the negative perception and coverage of Muslims in the media is pervasive.³

According to Roland Schlatz, Founder and CEO of Media Tenor International, "80 percent of all reports on Muslims and Islam are negative."⁴ By comparison, "70 percent of the coverage on North Korea—a designated terrorist state—is negative."⁵ Additionally, the media overwhelmingly ties Islam and Muslims to terrorism,⁶ placing a great deal of pressure on the personhood and identity of young American Muslims.

The almost constant external attacks have a compounding effect when added on to the challenges youth already face as older adolescents (15 to 17) and emergent adults (18 to 25). Adolescence and emergent adulthood are periods of great transformation accompanied by complex changes in the brain and the body. Cognitive processes such as reasoning, planning, judgment, and self-regulation evolve and grow at this time and are not complete until at least the age of 25.⁷

As a result, adolescent and emergent adult behaviors shift dramatically during this period. The most common behavioral changes seen across cultures are: 1. increased novelty seeking; 2. increased risk-taking; and 3. a social affiliation shift toward peer-based interactions.⁸

According to the National Institute of Mental Health, young people in this age range are at their, "lifelong peak of physical health, strength, and mental capacity."⁹ They are also at their most hazardous age. Mortality rates due to injury increase significantly in late adolescence (15 to 19 years old), as do rates of death due to injury, crime rates among young males, and rates of alcohol abuse.¹⁰

ISPU's joint research with the Family and Youth Institute (FYI) has shown that young American Muslims are not that different from their peers.¹¹ Socialized and acculturated with their non-Muslim peers, their behaviors mimic those of the broader population. For example, according to State of American Muslim Youth: Research and Recommendations, an alarming number of young American Muslims engage in risky behaviors including substance abuse, risky sexual behaviors and gambling.

Although most young people do transition through this age successfully, genes, childhood experiences, and environment can positively or negatively impact development. Support, guidance, family bonds, and a strong foundational development at this stage are critical to life-long mental health.¹²

At the family and community levels, parental and adult involvement, and a young person's sense of belonging, are harbingers of their future success and well-being. At the community level, quality youth programming—online, offline, youth-led, and adult-led—seem to be key to integrated identity development.

Qualitative research by ISPU suggests that American Muslim parents are struggling to provide young American Muslims the supportive environment they need. Many young American Muslims feel unsupported and misunderstood by their parents. Children of immigrants feel misunderstood because their parents do not understand American social contexts and youth culture.¹³ Children of American Muslim converts say their parents cannot understand their challenges because they were not raised as Muslims.¹⁴

American Muslim communities' efforts to date are not hitting the mark for young American Muslims either. Many young American Muslims, "feel disconnected, judged, excluded and unsafe in mosques."¹⁵ Convert youth and African American Muslim youth in particular feel isolated and unwelcome as many American Muslim communities do not recognize or empathize with their challenges—namely post-conversion crises for convert youth and racism for African American Muslim youth.

Although some mosques and community centers have youth programming, and some national Muslim organizations focus on youth development, these programs are frequently underfunded and under-resourced.¹⁶ Not finding solace or support in American Muslim institutions and feeling increasingly alienated in their Muslim spaces, many young American Muslims feel like they don't fit in anywhere.

Thus, there is an urgent need in American Muslim communities to recognize and understand American Muslim youth's vulnerabilities, as well as the risks associated with certain behaviors and the serious consequences of those risks.¹⁷ Even more critically, American Muslim communities need to develop strategic solutions for both proactive prevention and effective intervention.

Findings from Past Research

Relevant research on American Muslim youth includes the joint ISPU and FYI report, State of American Muslim Youth: Research and Recommendations by Dr. Sameera Ahmed, Executive Director, Family and Youth Institute (FYI),¹⁸ and a literature review Young Adult participation in American Congregations by Faiqa Mahmood, ISPU Fellow.

Key Findings from State of American Muslim Youth: Research and Recommendations

American Muslim Youth Are Similar to their Non-Muslim Peers

- American Muslim youth are socialized in non-Muslim settings—whether it be the schools they attend, the camps they go to, etc.
- American Muslim youth are exposed to the same media messaging as non-Muslims (e.g. values, standards of beauty, perception of Muslims).

American Muslim Youth are Unique

- Despite all these similar exposures and attitudes, the experiences of American Muslim youth are unique from their non-Muslim peers. For example, most American Muslim youth will experience some form of Islamophobia. However, their individual experiences are also unique based on their location, socioeconomic and racial backgrounds.

^a Mosque: Arabic word for a Muslim place of worship.

Several underserved and at-risk American Muslim Youth populations exist:

- Convert youth
- African American youth
- Youth engaging in risky behaviors

Convert Youth

- Young converts are making a major life change at a time when they are still dependent on their parents physically, financially and emotionally. If their parents are not supportive of their conversion, it is important for them to have an alternative support system in the American Muslim community.
- Young converts often find that their experience as new Muslims is dependent on their race, both the race from which they convert and the predominant race of their adopted Muslim community. For example, converts from the African American community assimilating into an immigrant Muslim community may face racism.
- Young converts also find that their experience as new Muslims is dependent on gender. The FYI's research found that gender impacts integration. It's easier for women converts to integrate particularly if they're identifiably Muslim.
- Converts' integration into the American Muslim community is also dependent on the profile of their mosque and community (size, diversity, location, etc.) they are joining. Typically, urban mosques are larger, more diverse, and offer more programming, and thus are easier to integrate into.

African American Youth

- In their everyday lives, African American Muslims are viewed as black first. The reality of institutionalized racism and their sociocultural context has a deep impact on African American Muslims. American Muslim mosques and communities must understand the impact of this reality on their lives.
- Young African American males may be more inclined to see Islam as an alternative, given numerous positive images of African American Muslim males within popular culture, as well as the African American community. They relate to prominent African American Muslims including Malcolm X, Mohammed Ali, Kareem Abdul Jabbar, Yasiin Bey (formerly Mos Def), Lupe Fiasco, Q-Tip, Freeway, Keith Ellison, Andre Carson and many others—as Muslims, as Americans and as African Americans.

- Many immigrant Muslim communities are not aware of—or choose not to acknowledge—the historical and current contributions of African American Muslims to the building of America. In addition, African American Muslims' experiences and perspectives are often not included within the American Muslim narrative.
- Elder African American Muslims in the community often converted as adults and sometimes struggle to relate to African American Muslim youth.
- As a result, African American Muslim youth have difficulty in identifying living role models that can empathize with their youth experiences and struggles.

American Muslim Youth engaging in potentially risky behaviors

- Studies indicate patterns of increasing risky behavior including drug and excessive alcohol use among youth.
- According to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration's (SAMSHA) 2010 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, 63% of full-time college students in the United States consumed alcohol in the month prior to the survey. The FYI has explored alcohol use in various sample populations, and their data analysis indicates that one in two Muslim college students reported alcohol consumption in the year prior.
- The FYI's preliminary research on American Muslim illicit drug use indicates usage by one in four Muslim youth. This rate is similar to SAMSHA's rate of usage by non-Muslim college students.
- FYI research identified a study of American college students in which lifetime prevalence of non-marital sexual intercourse was 76 percent.
- In a national sample of college students, the lifetime prevalence of sexual intercourse among never married Muslim college students was 54 percent.

- Engaging in one form of risky behavior increases the likelihood of engaging in other risk behaviors.
- There was no significant difference in alcohol and marijuana usage, and sexual activity between genders.
- More men than women use tobacco, particularly prior to college.

The American Muslim Youth convening focused primarily on intervention and prevention. Key findings from State of American Muslim Youth: Research and Recommendations on prevention and intervention include:

Prevention

The first step is effective youth programming. Components of an effective youth program include:

- Collaboration and partnership between groups serving youth
- Youth empowering programs in environments that are strength-based, youth-generated, and address their identified needs
- A positive relational experience with peers, mentors and adults
- Clear programmatic objectives and goals that inform and direct youth activities
- A multi-method, multimodal approach to achieve programmatic goals
- Opportunities for varying levels of participation and multiple points of entry to allow for greater participation
- Integration of social media and technology
- Financial sustainability

Intervention

With regard to intervention, there are several areas of focus:

- Strengthening families and their ability to deal with challenges – teaching parents to more effectively communicate and engage with their children so that the parent-child relationship can serve as a protective factor.
- Engaging in school – creating programs where American Muslims can engage and feel respected.
- Making mosques welcoming – creating an atmosphere in the mosque where youth feel welcome and not judged or ostracized.

- Promoting exploration – developing spaces where youth can explore their identities, and gain exposure to art, culture, performance, etc.
- Developing a better understanding – between American Muslim communities and the wider American landscape.

The FYI report also makes recommendations around three developmental contexts (family, school, and the Muslim community) that must play a role in enhancing American Muslim youth development. Finally, it is believed that a more nuanced understanding of American Muslim youth developmental contexts—along with research findings and programmatic recommendations—will enhance current youth development efforts.

Literature review of Young Adult participation in American Congregations

As part of ISPU's research for their study Reimagining Muslim Spaces, the piece Young Adult Participation in American Congregations by LiErin Probasco serves as a set of case studies that can be reviewed to identify best practices from other faith traditions that can be replicated in the American Muslim context.

In this study:

- Young adults are adults between 18 and 34. And the data was collected from two (2) major studies:
 - FACT National Survey, 2010 – very few mosques were included in this survey
 - Mosque survey by Dr. Ihsan Bagby
- Congregations with 21% or more young adults qualified as congregations with “significant” young adult participation (Only 16% of congregations had “significant” young adult participation).

From Dr. Ihsan Bagby's 2011 mosque survey, the number of mosques and the number of congregations are increasing. Between 2000 and 2011 there was a 74% increase in the number of mosques.¹⁹ However, the primary concern of many mosques is their inability to engage and keep youth in mosques.

This seems to be a challenge across faith traditions. According to the Pew survey, approximately one in three young adults (ages 18-33) surveyed are religiously unaffiliated.²⁰ However, lack of religious affiliation does not necessarily mean lack of interest in religion. According to College Students' Belief and Values (CSVb) survey, 80% of college freshmen expressed interest in spirituality.²¹

Thus, there isn't a clear way to engage young American Muslims—as the mosque for many is not somewhere they regularly attend. However, there are opportunities there to meet young people where they are. Many young American Muslims are not becoming irreligious per se; they are just becoming unaffiliated.

Engaging with young people and meeting them where they are needs to be a stated and deliberate priority of any congregation seeking to engage youth. Having said that, congregations and their leaders need to set realistic expectations and invest in the next generation without expecting immediate returns.

Seeking Solutions Together

Over the course of two days, groups engaged in dynamic conversation using the World Café model on the following six (6) questions presented by ISPU.

1. How can we provide better support to convert youth?
2. What can we do to prevent drug use among youth? How can the American Muslim community better address the needs of youth struggling with addiction?
3. Growing up online, youth face numerous challenges and opportunities. How do we keep American Muslim youth safe online from radicalization, pornography, child predators, and bullying?
4. Simultaneously, how do we nurture positive online engagement through social media, peer networks, apps, and online content?
5. How can predominantly South-Asian and Arab-American mosques promote a greater understanding of race, civil rights, and create inclusive environments for African American Muslim youth?
6. What basic knowledge and literacy gaps about Islam are important to fill for American Muslim youth and what resources already exist?

As questions 3 and 4 both addressed youth online engagement, these two questions were combined for the purposes of the report.

These particular questions were chosen because they addressed some of the most pressing issues facing Muslim young people according to both qualitative and quantitative research. The selected questions are not meant to be exhaustive of all challenges. We recognize for example that we did not address offline bullying, or the unique needs of refugee youth. These important topics may be the focus of future research.

A large number of ideas, opinions, and solutions were presented as participants engaged in timed blocks of discussion on each question on the first day. On the second day, groups worked to refine and detail some of their discoveries into actionable recommendations.

The recommendations presented by the groups are varied and diverse. However, they had several common threads and themes. Most of the recommendations included:

- A needs assessment
- A focus on promoting education, awareness or training on their focus issues
- An emphasis on engaging supporting, celebrating, and advocating for youth,
- Development or repackaging of content or programming (khutbas, videos, talking points)
- A youth-led component (educating parents, content creation and production, online promotion)
- Investing in youth and youth-targeted content and resources
- Developing and implementing policies to force change
- Capacity building efforts

Supporting New Muslim Youth:

How can we provide better support to convert youth?

Introduction and Key Themes

According to Ta'leef Collective, over 20,000 Americans convert to Islam annually. But, many new converts leave Islam in the first two years after conversion.¹

In this series of small group discussions, participants discussed the challenges faced by and needs of young American Muslim converts, including “disruption within family context, lack of social support or mentorship, and challenges integrating into the Muslim community.”² Also discussed were opportunities and ways in which local communities can better serve those needs including investing in convert care programming and training, promoting integration and a sense of belonging and creating a social and spiritual support network for new converts.

Following are some of the major themes and recommendations from the convening.

Convert Needs and the Convert Care Continuum

Many people are curious about Islam. They actively seek information on Islam for a variety of reasons—doubts about their own religion, questions about Islam, or validation of their own existence. Regardless of their reasons, conversion is often preceded by a time of seeking and searching.

For many, taking shahada^a is not their first step in their journey or evolution toward Islam. However, it is often their first public and celebrated step toward the faith. Shahada is a joyful and emotional event for the person converting and for the community they convert with. What many do not realize though is that the post-shahada period is the most critical time for converts.

“[Converting] is like going down the rabbit hole; it’s a mental trip.”

—Workshop participant

“The question of the propagation of Islam is not one of getting people to say their shahada, meaning it’s not one of getting people to embrace Islam. It’s what you do with them after that.”

—Usama Canon, Founding Director, Ta'leef Collective

^a Shahada: The testimony of faith: La ilaha illa Allah (There is no deity but God. Muhammad is the messenger of God).

The Convert Care Continuum can be summarized as follows:

- Active seeking:
 - Seeking answers to questions
 - Learning about Islam
- Conversion
- Strengthening foundation:
 - Gaining spiritual knowledge
 - Developing support networks
 - Identity integration and community acceptance³

“When we hear the story of somebody who converts to Islam, we listen to it in the frame of ‘Tell us why you became Muslim.’ We hear about this impassioned story that gives us a solid boost in our own faith... We never hear about what was hard in the process, we never really hear about what was difficult in the transition to Muslim community, why perhaps it wasn’t the easiest decision and how we (the Muslim community) potentially made it a little bit harder. We feel that that is a story that needs to be heard.”

—Imam Khalid Latif, Executive Director, The Islamic Center at New York University⁶

The Convert Experience

Converting is very overwhelming. For a convert, becoming Muslim is an end point to the life they knew. Simultaneously, it is a time full of certainty regarding their belief, and full of apprehension regarding their practice of Islam, their lives and their identities. Many Muslims born into Islam don’t understand this experience.

Taking shahada is not hard. What is hard is losing friendships and family bonds, living and learning a new culture and religion, and creating new cultural and social affiliations. The first few months and years post-shahada can be crisis filled, sad, scary and isolating.

New converts, particularly youth can be very impressionable and unsure of themselves, and for them to grow spiritually toward sustainable practice and knowledge of Islam, they need to feel supported and heard. Initially, just maintaining God consciousness and managing existing relationships is critical. Without these, a convert may leave Islam in the first few months or years post-conversion.

New converts’ needs are numerous, particularly in the beginning. During this pivotal time many new converts crave company so they are not alone with their fears and temptations. Non-Muslim friends or family may not be able to understand or offer support. Thus, being with Muslims can help them “ease into the religion” and “reconcile between the past, present and future.”⁴

Finding Faith in Prison

Several participants mentioned the needs of convert youth in the prison system. According to Mustafa Davis’ new documentary Prison Blues which explores the reality of incarceration in the United States through a Muslim lens, “80% of inmates who ‘find faith’ in prison, convert to Islam.”⁵

American Muslims make up a significant number of the prison population in the United States (estimated to be 15% of the two million prisoners⁷), and thus understanding their experience and needs is critical to serving the convert population. Numerous American Muslim organizations around the country are involved in prison outreach. For example, according to the Encyclopedia of Prisons and Correctional Facilities by Mary Bosworth, a nationwide survey of 130 predominantly African American masjids found that nine in ten are involved with prison ministries and outreach to ex-offenders. Additionally, the Tayba Foundation in Union City, California conducts distance-learning programs for the incarcerated and formerly incarcerated.⁸ Other organizations involved in prison outreach include the Islamic Institute of Orange County (Link Outside),⁹ Muslim Chaplain Services of Virginia,¹⁰ Islamic Society of Greater Houston, and Dar Al Hijrah in Virginia. Unfortunately, little to no research is currently available regarding Muslim convert youth in particular.

Offer Support and Mentor Networks

Conversion can be very disruptive for both convert youth and their families. It can cause upheaval and tension in a convert youth's family life at a time when they are still emotionally and financially dependent on their parents. Converts and their family members can become alienated from one another leaving converts isolated, vulnerable and alone.

In some cases, the family of origin may disown the convert. If that is the case, communication with the family can be attempted but may not be possible. But in other cases, their parents love them and want to be part of their lives. Keeping parents and siblings in the picture and being available to provide support and answer questions can help converts and their families retain and strengthen family bonds.

Additionally, helping new convert youth establish support networks that meet them "where they are and as they are" is critical as they navigate between their new faith and existing traditions and cultures, while also forging a new path forward.

Communities of support for convert youth can include:

- By convert, for convert support networks like Conver(t)sations at the Islamic Center at NYU, New York City; Common grounds: Coffee and Convert-sations by Urban Ummah in Atlanta, GA; and MAPS Youth Convert-sations in Redmond, WA.
- Mentor and buddy networks, including big brother/big sister and peer mentor programs where convert youth can be matched with a Muslim mentor who can meet with them one-on-one to help answer their questions, introduce them to other Muslims, and offer them emotional support. For example, New Muslim Care in Canada has a Muslim buddy training program; and Ta'leef Collective's Welcome to the Fold has a peer mentor program.
- Local convert care support networks, which are currently offered by dedicated Muslim centers and organizations in various parts of the country. For example, the Muslim Enrichment Project in Michigan, the MECCA Center in New York City, KC New Muslim Care in Kansas City, and ADAMS Center in Virginia to name a few. Additionally, GainPeace is the Islamic Circle of North America's (ICNA) outreach project to support new Muslims.

"I worked with a young woman who was hijabi,^b wearing abayas^c while living in NY – but when she went back home to visit family in the midwest she would be in shorts and saying her prayers in her head because if her family knew she was Muslim they would kill her."

—Workshop participant

"A lot of what is done for converts is how to do wudu^d or how to pray but we really need the social guidance as well – understanding the psychological piece of the conversion process."

—Workshop participant

b Hijabi: A term used to describe a woman who wears a head scarf.

c Abaya: A loose over-garment worn by some Muslim women.

d Wudu: Ritual washing performed in preparation for prayer and worship.

- Youth networks including the Muslim Students Association (MSA), the Muslim Youth of North America (MYNA), Muslim Interscholastic Tournament (MIST), Young Muslims and Muslim American Society (MAS) where convert youth can work with other Muslim youth organizing and participating in events.
- Convert youth and families networks where convert youth and their families can meet with other converts and their families.
- Fictive kin^e family/support networks where a carefully selected, vetted Muslim family can ‘adopt a convert’ and help them along the convert continuum by adding a normative aspect to their life as a new Muslim. Fictive kin are not a replacement to families; they allow convert youth the opportunity to grow into Islam and gain compassionate social guidance in the privacy of a home. Psychologically, eating in a Muslim home, praying with a Muslim family, and having everyday interactions with parental figures who are Muslim can be very calming for convert youth.

Ask Questions, Don’t Make Assumptions

When someone converts they are, as one participant put it, “coming with their entire past experience.” They need to be accepted for who and what they are. The participant continued, “We need to not pretend that their entire past is deleted, such as substances, sexuality, lifestyles, what they eat, their relationships.”

Little research has been done on converts to date, much less still on convert youth. A participant stated, the only way to “provide programming that is not rooted in your own personal experience and understand a new convert’s needs is to ask them, empathize with them and listen to them.”

Converts are after all individuals with unique life experiences and paths. Most have basic foundational needs that need to be met post-conversion like spiritual guidance and assistance seeking Islamic knowledge. However, their needs vary based on their unique paths, their knowledge of and journey to Islam, their location, cultural and racial backgrounds and social and financial situations.

If imams,^f chaplains and other American Muslim leaders in local communities conduct ongoing needs assessments—interviewing new converts one on one and listening to their personal narratives—convert care can be more customized and effective. Decisions on local programming and mentoring can be made based on data not assumptions. Relevant and customized local programming to complement foundational curricula can be developed to suit the needs of new converts.

^e Fictive Kin: A term used by anthropologists and ethnographers to describe social ties that are based on neither blood ties nor marital ties. To the extent that blood or marital ties might be considered true ties, fictive kinship refers to kinship ties that are fictive, or not real.

^f Imam: A Muslim prayer leader.

Teach New Converts to Fish

Converts need and want to strengthen their knowledge and practice of Islam. The goal though is not to spoon feed new converts information, but to teach them what they need to know about Islam so they can be self-sufficient in their pursuit of knowledge and practice of Islam.

New Muslim kits offer converts baseline Islamic knowledge. The organization New Muslim Care, based in Malaysia and Canada, offers free New Muslim welcome gifts (including an English translation of the Quran,⁹ a new Muslim guide, the book Fortress of the Muslim, DVDs and a prayer mat) to new converts anywhere in the world.¹¹

Ta'leef Collective's Welcome to the Fold also offers a convert kit which includes several books and CDs including: an audio CD of 'His Character was the Quran' by Shaykh Abdullah Bin Biyyah & Shaykh Hamza Yusuf; Book of Assistance by Imam Al-Haddad; Submission, Faith & Beauty: The Religion of Islam by Joseph Lombard; Understanding Islam & the Muslims: The Muslim Family, Islam and World Peace by T.J. Winter & John Williams and the Quran, translated by Maulana Wahiduddin Khan.

To date, there is no standardized foundational curriculum in the United States for new converts, but workshop participants suggested some critical starter topics for discussions that can be hosted in local Muslim spaces. These topics include, but are not limited to: Islam 101, Quranic Arabic 101, How to Pray and Important FAQs (for example, dealing with anti-Muslim bigotry, differentiating between sunnah^h and *fard*ⁱ and differentiating between culture and religion).

A new book, Being Muslim: A Practical Guide by Dr. Asad Tarsin of Ta'leef Collective set for release in August 2015 covers the essential aspects of Islam: belief, worship and lifestyle using the Narration of Gabriel (Hadith Jibril) as a basic framework.¹³ It also covers the basics of Islamic belief, how to pray and fast, spiritual refinement, a brief examination of the life of the Prophet Muhammad, an introduction to the Quran, and guidelines for living an Islamically ethical lifestyle. It also includes a glossary of frequently used Islamic terms, an appendix of short selections from the Quran, and a list of recommended reading. The book is based on the free nine-class course first taught by Dr. Tarsin in Michigan, which is now part of the curricula in Muslim Centers in the United States and Canada.

In-Person Support, Not Just Online Information

New converts can go online to learn how to pray and how to do wudu; however convert youth need human connections and interactions via mentoring and support networks. Several programs for in-person support do exist, and Muslim spaces can offer mentor and network programs by partnering with or modeling on existing convert care programs.

“All of the great learning that Muslims displayed throughout their history was always predicated on a foundational, core knowledge that the great usuli scholars of Islamic jurisprudence called fard ‘ayn, or ‘the individual obligations.’”

—Shaykh Hamza Yusuf¹²

“Don’t send [new convert youth] out into the virtual world.”

—Workshop participant

g Quran: The central religious text of Islam, which Muslims believe to be a revelation from God.

h Sunnah: The “path” or “example” of the Prophet Muhammad.

i Fard: An Islamic term which denotes a religious duty commanded by God.

For example:

- Ta’leef Collective offers a program for new converts called Welcome to the Fold which provides opportunities for new Muslims to engage their peers, share both challenges and successes, and reap the beneficial fruits that only the tree of good company can bear.¹⁴
- The Muslim Enrichment Project (MEP) seeks to retain and serve new and returning Muslims in Michigan.¹⁵ MEP provides “hands on” assistance to new and returning Muslims by providing educational support consisting of classes, lectures and workshops on a variety of Islamic topics; social support focused on providing positive social outlets such as social gatherings, luncheons and dinners, outdoor activities (Juma’ah^j prayers, barbeques and picnics); help in getting connected to the community, mentoring/buddy system support and advice from members of the community.

New converts also benefit from experiential learning programs like retreats, camps, conventions and intensive courses. They can gain knowledge and develop skills through direct experience outside of traditional settings. These programs can be expensive particularly for a young person, so funding and scholarships would be required. Experiential learning programs mentioned at the convening included Rihla, Muslim Interscholastic Tournament (MIST), Muslim Youth Camp (MYC), AlMaghrib, the Appalachian Retreat, and many others.

Invest in Convert Care Training

“Being a convert doesn’t mean you know how to take care of a convert.”

—Workshop Participant

Converts, particularly new converts and young converts, are very vulnerable. Muslim spaces need to focus on convert care, and make it a priority. One participant suggested establishing a convert care liaison trained in convert care who reports to the imam. Other participants suggested investing in convert care training.

Several established and well-regarded organizations and programs focus on outreach and convert care. One example is the Mu’allif Mentorship program developed by Ta’leef Collective. Instead of reinventing the wheel, it would make sense to encourage American Muslims and the Muslim spaces they participate in to both invest in and receive training from existing convert care programming, and utilize their curricula. By contributing to existing convert care programs, they will become more financially sustainable. And by supporting and attending the trainings, more Muslim spaces and more individuals will be better equipped to mentor and support converts.

^j Juma’ah: Friday Noon Prayer.

Key Recommendations

1. Host Ongoing Convert Appreciation and Convert Support Events

Target Audience: Imams, Chaplains

Recommendation: Develop at least two Friday khutbahs^k a year speaking to the experiences of modern converts—with a particular emphasis on youth. Talking points can include convert care, the challenges converts face, lack of support, and loss/lack of support networks.

Target Audience: Board members, Youth directors, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Host meals with converts and their families at least once a quarter, host a picnic/dinner/meal for converts, particularly convert youth and their families to welcome them to the community, and help them feel comfortable with Muslims and Islam.

Target Audience: Board members, Youth directors, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Develop at least one discussion panel with converts every year where converts can speak with the community about their issues and needs post-conversion. Include at least one convert who converted in their teens to give them the opportunity to talk about their struggles post-conversion.

2. Establish a Process for Welcoming New Muslims

Target Audience: Board members, Chaplains, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Source and provide new Muslim kits to new converts on an ongoing, as needed basis. New Muslim Care (<http://www.newmuslimcare.org>) sells new Muslim kits.

Target Audience: Imams, Board members, Chaplains, National youth organizations

Recommendation: Establish a follow-up system and develop a database with information on new converts who take shahada and/or pray at your Muslim space. Most Muslim centers do not keep track of new converts. Basic information collected can include name, contact, occupation, age, interests, and family members.

^k Khutbah: Sermon given during the Friday Noon Prayer.

Target Audience: Board members, Chaplains, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Establish a tool for matching converts and mentors using the new database, and using pre-selected criteria (age, location, education interests, etc.) to match converts and mentors. Matching should occur within one month of conversion.

Target Audience: Imams, Board members, Chaplains, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Establish a New Muslim welcome policy that acknowledges, recognizes, welcomes and supports new Muslims always, and celebrates them and their experiences on a regular basis at community events.

Target Audience: Board members, National youth organizations

Recommendation: Host quarterly/seasonal community luncheons to welcome new converts.

3. Conduct Convert Youth Needs Assessment

Target Audience: Imams, Board members, and Youth directors

Recommendation: Conduct ongoing needs assessment with new converts by establishing a committee at your organization to conduct confidential, in-person ongoing needs assessments for convert youth. Quantitative information can be tabulated and updated annually, while qualitative information gleaned in these assessments can be communicated to the other committees like the programming committee so that converts needs are being addressed and met on a regular basis.

4. Invest in Convert Care Training and Programming

Target Audience: Imams, Board members

Recommendation: Create a budget and program to support convert youth care. Prioritize convert care and allocate resources for programming, training and counseling at your Muslim space to serve growing convert populations, as well as young American Muslims who are seeking to learn about Islam.

Target Audience: Imams, Board members, and Youth directors

Recommendation: Support “for us, by us” convert discussion groups. For example, the Islamic Center at NYU hosts Conver(t)sations, a discussion group for converts. These groups are focused on creating a safe space for converts to tell their stories, and share their fears and challenges.

Target Audience: Imams, Board members, and Youth directors

Recommendation: Offer ongoing support to converts and their families by offering space and regular (monthly/quarterly) programming.

Target Audience: Parents, Board members, Youth directors, Chaplains, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Support and fund existing convert care training (online and in person programs) like the Mu'allif Mentorship Program at Ta'leef Collective (<http://taleefcollective.org/tag/muallif-mentorship-program/>). Send board members, youth directors and others for training to these programs to build and expand convert care training capacity in Muslim spaces across the country.

Target Audience: Parents, Board members, Youth directors, Chaplains, and National youth organizations

Recommendation: Fund scholarships for convert youth to attend experiential learning programs including but not limited to:

APPENDIX 1:

Scope Of Convening

At this convening, ISPU brought forward some of this valuable research on American Muslim youth to establish context, and asked for the group's input in developing strong recommendations. The convening was structured in three distinct parts:

1. Take in research - On Saturday morning, to establish the research context for the convening, Dalia Mogahed and others from ISPU reviewed relevant research on American Muslim youth and young adult participation in congregations; and presented guidelines for actionable and effective recommendations.
2. Think creatively - Once the research context had been set, the larger group broke out into smaller groups for discussion using the world café method. Using this method, Saturday afternoon, the group engaged in six (6) constructive and dynamic groups discussions: four (4) 30-minute and two (2) 10-minute sessions. These sessions were facilitated, but free flowing to allow participants to ideate in small groups.
3. Think pragmatically about actionable recommendations - After ideating for several hours, participants regrouped late Saturday afternoon and again on Sunday morning to develop and detail pragmatic actionable recommendations for each of the questions.

Norm Creation

At the start of the convening, the group established agreed upon norms for the weekend. These norms included:

- Step back, step forward – to hear from as many voices as possible
- Be present – mute cell phones
- One mic – when someone is speaking, they are the only one speaking

- Avoid jargon – use accessible language, clarify what you are saying, don't assume everyone understands acronyms and terminologies
- Express appreciation
- Brave space – be brave enough to dream and to say the things that don't often get said
- Safe space – this is a place for respect and confidentiality
- Be open to others thoughts/ideas – “don't yuck my yum”
- Be respectful of others religiosity – avoid using labels like moderate, conservative, etc.
- Respect time – be timely
- Coaching – ask questions to understand what people are saying
- Agree to a social contract of professional ethics
- Make 'I' versus 'We' statements – understand that participants are presenting their reality and that it may not be shared by everyone in the room

World Café Model

The World Café is a simple, effective, and flexible format for hosting large group dialogue.²² The methodology is based on seven (7) integrated design principles:

1. Setting the Context
2. Creating Hospitable Space
3. Exploring Questions that Matter
4. Encouraging Everyone's Contribution
5. Connecting Diverse Perspectives
6. Listening together for Patterns and Insights
7. Sharing Collective Discoveries²³

The World Café model includes the following five (5) modifiable components:

1. Setting: A café environment: round tables covered with paper, pens and a “talking stick.”

2. Welcome and Introduction: A warm welcome and an introduction to the World Café process, context and etiquette.
3. Small Group Rounds: Three or more 20-minute rounds of conversation per small group. At the end of the 20-minutes, each member of the group moves to a different new table. Conversations may or may not be hosted or facilitated.
4. Questions: Each round is prefaced with a question designed for the specific context and desired purpose of the session. The same questions can be used for more than one round.
5. Harvest: After the small groups and/or in between rounds individuals are invited to share insights or other results from their conversations with the rest of the large group.

Imam Khalid Latif is a University Chaplain for New York University, Executive Director of the Islamic Center at NYU, and a Chaplain for the NYPD. He was appointed the first Muslim chaplain at NYU in 2005. He was also appointed the first Muslim chaplain at Princeton University in 2006. Spending a year commuting between these two excellent institutions, he finally decided to commit full-time to New York University's Islamic Center where his position was officially institutionalized in the spring of 2007. Under his leadership, the Islamic Center at NYU became the first ever Muslim student center at an institution of higher education in the United States. In 2007, Mayor Michael Bloomberg nominated Imam Latif to become the youngest chaplain in history of the New York City Police Department at the age of 24. Most recently, Imam Latif was selected as one of 60 NYC leaders to serve on May Bill De Blasio's Transition Team, helping to recommend and select individuals for key roles in the current NYC administration and also appointed to a "Task Force to Combat Hate" by NYC Public Advocate Tisch James to deal with the rise in Islamophobic, anti-semitic and anti-sikh sentiment in NYC.
